ABSTRACT

Each country needs a stable financial system. Therefore, the head of state appoints a person who is responsible for managing the country's financial system for a certain period of time. This person is referred to as the head of the central bank or the head of the central bank, but in other countries it is also referred to as other names. The head of the Central Bank is responsible for the financial stability of a financial system and is also responsible for keeping the macroeconomics stable, especially maintaining rate stability or preventing inflection in a country's economic system. The head of the Central Bank is also obliged to ensure that financial institutions in the financial sector provide the necessary funds for the production of goods and services, leading to the growth of the country's economy.
